Excerpt: .Thunderer go hang, thinks the novelist, philosophically. One true woman's heart has been moved by my work, one pure mind has recognised its worth. A fig for their praise or censure. Orpheus braved the burning blasts of Tartarus in quest of his love, and shall I do less for my art? Philosopher and student of human nature as he is, Alton Lyndhurst is in love! Man of the world, anatomiser, he cannot mistake the signs in himself. One single word of praise has outweighed all the studied and laboured thrusts of the Thunderer; he forgets everything, from the C sharp minor of reprobation to the E flat major of mild approval of its contemporaries. Maud Carlington has lived in him and with him through all the varied stages of that twin world, the real and the ideal, accessible only to the true artist. She has been his model, around which he has woven his airy fancies, until they have stood forth fancies no longer, but living breathing humanity. While the last finishing touches are being put upon the Bandoline, he lives his life as of old, dines at his club, or at other men's tables, flirts betimes, and says clever things, or is supposed to say them. Hampton House, on the Crescent, is the resort of the notables of the Northern Island, as its owner is, without doubt, the most popular man in the country. Alton Lyndhurst is a constant visitor. The...
