When the early movement began which led to the introduction of the manual arts into the public schools, educators were already inquiring into the reasons for the rapid falling off of interest, which caused so many children, who were under no compulsion to support themselves or contribute to the support of their families, to leave school and begin work. During the intervening years the theory of industrial training has been preached to the world from every platform. We have been told that as the primitive races began with simple agricultural, mechanical, and domestic activities, so should the child in his training begin with similar experiences - in his initial steps being taught to do things, afterward finding all of his book studies closely related to these fundamental life operations, these action studies, which constitute the nucleus around which the rest of his education should be built.
