Bound to Rise by Horatio Alger The hero, Henry Walton, is the oldest of six children, and is described as a broad-shouldered, sturdy boy, with a frank, open face, resolute, though good-natured (12). Regarding his education, the narrator allows that though a tolerably good scholar, Henry Walton was deficient in many respects, on account of the limited nature of his opportunities (17). Although he lives with both his parents at the start of this tale, they are a very poor family, and their only cow is near death. Hiram Walton, Henry's father, is revealed to be responsible in part for the family's lack of success and security; he is one of those men who, for some unaccountable reason, never get on in the world. . . do not have the knack of conquering fortune (12). When the family's cow dies, Hiram goes to borrow money from miser Squire Green to buy a new one. Green takes advantage of his borrower's need and charges an extravagant rate of interest. Meanwhile, at the local school, Henry performs admirably at his exams. He wins a book, a biography of Benjamin Franklin. Inspired by the tale, he decides to leave town to earn money to pay for the cow. From northern New Hampshire, he sets out to the south. Eventually he comes to a slightly larger town and gets a job replacing a young man named Bob Leavitt, who is leaving his father's shoe-making business to work in his uncle's dry goods store in Boston. In the shoe shop, he works with spendthrift Luke Harrison, who calls Henry Walton a miser for refusing to play billiards. Henry Walton goes to the library...
