NATURAL SURROUNDINGS 75 faction of instinctive cravings is added to the sum of those associations which create strong impulses, it is inevitable that the impressionability of the individual will grow in proportion. In such cases, as life progresses, the subconscious part of the mind will assume the preponderance in thought and action, work and play; the passions both good and bad will be governed by impulse alone. The conscious self, the intellectual part of the mind, will be suppressed; the effect of what is done or said or thought will be of minor importance as compared with the satisfaction of impulsive desire. Moreover, all outward stimulation will directly create emotions and reactions in the nervous system, which will in their turn produce abnormal conditions that may finally pass beyond control. It would therefore seem no less important that the subconscious self and all that tends to its development should be held in due control and not suffered to assume abnormal influence. All appeals to the imagination of the young, all violent emotions and abrupt changes of surroundings, should be kept within narrow limits. And, although it is quite as dangerous to the development of the plastic juvenile mind to teach concentration of attention or to appeal to the memory (which is of such slow growth, as it depends upon association) too early, it is well to enlarge gradually the field of exact observation. In nature, the contemplation of which is most refreshing to the...
